

The climate crisis – be part of the solution

Climate change has implications for the economy, for jobs and for working environments. It's a trade union issue.

Workplaces are responsible for 45% of UK carbon emissions. This crisis is a collective problem that demands collective solutions.

Working together, trade unions, workers and employers can make a real difference to our environmental impact.

We should take personal responsibility and make changes in our everyday lives. But that won't be enough without bigger changes to our workplaces and society. This is what unions do best.

As the union that represents environmental professionals, we put expert voices at the centre of the climate change conversation. We believe governments and employers should do the same.

"We need to demand that our employers protect our environment and our future. It's difficult to do this alone, but as members of a trade union we have a voice."
